EXPLANATION OF CS FOR CS FOR SB 357 BY SENATOR GORDON

The following remarks by Senator Gordon on May 5, were ordered published in the Journal pursuant to the motion by Senator Barron:

Senator Gordon: Mr. President and fellow introducers of the bill: I think it would be helpful to describe the current committee substitute for committee substitute so that all of us will have an understanding of what's contained in the bill. You should understand that this bill started back in the deliberations of the Governor's Commission on Secondary Education on which the President, Senator Frank and I served as well as other people in Florida—the head of the Superintendent's Association, a distinguished educator, a school principal and a number of others who have had significant experience in education or education legislation. We've held four committee hearings on this bill and on the Governor's Commission report so that the bill represents a significant, long effort by the committee to come up with a bill that would address what we saw as the problems of secondary education in this state.

I think it is important to understand that what we've tried to do here is say that every student who graduates from high school in this state ought to have a common body of knowledge. We think that citizens of this state have to understand that the students who are going through high school now are going to have to live most of their productive lives in the twenty-first century. It is a considerable challenge to see what kind of education they require.

Further, we have the obligation under the constitution to have a uniform system of public schools. That question of uniformity is a significant one. Right now, in current law, we only require that a student pass the functional literacy test. That's all it really takes to get out of high school. Incidentally, the courts ruled yesterday that the state could impose that test. That's not much of a test. Local control, which has been the big password and guideline for education in the last several years, has produced a smoother administrative function of the schools, but it's produced—it's gone Heinz 10 better—sixty-seven varieties of high school graduates. We have systems in which only one year of math and science is required. We have systems in which more physical education is required for graduation than those for math and science. We have systems in which more than one-half of the student's curricula is elective. We have systems where you can get credit for working at McDonald's. We have, in fact, a system or systems that are really a disservice to the students' future by not really directing them to the realities of the twenty-first century.

And we have something else. We ought to understand a very good operational definition of education. A student who graduates from high school at age 18 is eligible to vote. Do we think that student has had enough education to make a proper evaluation of our competence to serve in this body? That's the essence of democratic government that the people can make an honest, rational judgment on whether candidate A or candidate B can better serve them or has better served them. Whether it's as a State Senator, as a City Commissioner, as a School Board member or as President of the United States, our democracy will not work unless the people have the understanding and the ability to make the kinds of judgments that are incumbent upon a citizen in a democracy.

This bill, among other things, is trying to establish a phased-in set of minimum state graduation standards. These standards are going to be phased in between 1985 and 1987. By June of '85, a student must acquire twenty-two—has to pass twenty-two—of twenty-four credits. Credit is one-year in a subject or subjects for one period a day. This requires six periods a day and includes high school grades nine through twelve, so six times four is twenty-four. A student has to pass twenty-two. By June of '86, a student will have to pass twenty-three of twenty-five credits, to include three in both math and science, and by June of '87, twenty-four of twenty-six credits. That's because we are mandating by 1985 either an extra period a day to go to a seven-period day or that we go to an extended school year of 210 days. We will fund some pilot projects during the next two years in some school districts so that a more rational choice can be made as to whether in 1985 the extension would be to a seven-period day or to an extended school year.

Those credits that are required would include four in English—Composition and Literature; three in Mathematics; three in Science, to include two laboratory Sciences; three in Social Sciences, that is two years of History, one of American History, one of World History, a half-year of Economics, which is to be a course that examines comparative economic systems, and a half-year in Government, which will also examine comparative political systems; a half-year of Vocational or Practical Arts, which is for everyone, not just for kids going into vocational training; and a half-year of Fine Arts for everyone. There is also a half-year of Physical Education and a half-year of life management skills. That leaves nine electives in the twenty-four. In spite of the quality of some of the letters, I'd like to make it clear to journalism students that if the school has journalism as an academic course, in addition to the English that's required, they certainly would get academic credit for it.

There are a number of other provisions in the bill. We've changed the Americanism versus Communism by expanding that block of required instruction into a year, and, as I pointed out, has the comparison of both the economic and political systems. Incidentally, we never required anybody to pass that course. We just required them to sit there and listen to it. That's one of the interesting things you'll find on the road to educational change. No volunteer or non-academic activities can count as credit toward graduation except with the approval of the State Board of Education. A very significant change in vocational education—vocational classes that cannot demonstrate at least a fifty percent placement rate cannot count toward graduation. Now there's an exception if, obviously, there is high unemployment, you're not going to get the placement rate. But the president can tell you, cite you examples of where students are spending half their day in baking classes in counties where there are no bakeries. We want to see to it that the vocational education students get what is relevant and studying something related to the jobs that are in existence in their own communities or in places where they will want to work. We are also saying that the compensatory and remedial classes can't count toward graduation. We expect that to be done in order to achieve some standard. Home Economics can count as a practical arts credit, but no more than three courses of non-job preparatory vocational educational homemaking can count toward graduation. The General Education Diploma, the GED, can't be used until the student is eighteen years old, so they can't get out of high school by taking it at sixteen. The GED was designed to give you credit for life experience, not as a way of getting out of school. And lastly, we're requiring a grade point average of a C average for being in extra-curricular activities.

To accomplish the course requirements for graduation, we've expanded the school times as I discussed before. All these changes have significant fiscal impact. But as Senator Maxwell noted in the Appropriations Committee Tuesday, we've trimmed this bill from initial impact of 160 million to about 40 million dollars. The changes in the FEFP in general are the following. We've changed the base student allocation for grades ten through twelve to include grade nine so that the extra money for high school will count for the ninth grade. By definition, we have increased the minimal instruction periods to provide for six periods of at least fifty minutes. Incidentally, we found that some school systems were operating on forty-five minute periods, on fifty minute, fifty-five, sixty and everywhere in between, so that the variation in the state between those school systems with the longest period and those with the shortest period meant, in fact, that students in the longest period school system had equivalent of another year's time spent in school by the time they completed four years. That is hardly an equal system of public education. We've authorized the expansion of summer school programs. High schools can earn additional FTE's for Advanced Placement courses. We've pushed very hard to encourage advanced placement, which are courses taken in high school which meet the College Entrance Examination Board standards and are used by almost every college or university in the country to give a student either credit for that course or permit him to go into the next level of course work. We created a new program category for computer literacy education and we suggested that computer literacy ought to be accomplished by the time the student gets to the ninth grade. And lastly, to discourage schools from allowing students to attend only half days, we've deleted provisions which allow students taking three credits or less to count as an FTE, so that means that students will spend a full day in school at all grade levels.

We've directed that the curriculum frameworks be developed by the DOE to get some standards so that if you are taking a course in Algebra in one school system, it's going to be significantly similar to what would be called Algebra in other school systems. We have no idea now that that's true. Addressing some of Senator Childers' concerns, we have directed districts to ensure that only quality instructional materials are used and that tests reflect the standards adopted by the districts. Research has indicated, by the way, that if you look at what has happened with school textbooks, the grade level, the reading level of the textbooks has been systematically lowered by the textbook manufacturers, so that very often you will find in the tenth grade a textbook, an adopted textbook that is at the sixth or seventh grade reading level. We also prohibited textbook councils from adopting materials in schools with reading levels more than one year below the grade level of the material. That happens to be a very significant change in textbooks that will put a lot of pressure on textbook publishers. The President and I discussed using the Education Commission of the States as a vehicle to get together with people from California and Texas, who are the other large textbook buyers, to see whether we can really pressure textbook people to give a decent reading level in the text. You understand that if you can graduate from high school and are never asked to read a textbook beyond the eighth or ninth grade level, you can hardly expect to be reading on a much higher level.

Over and above the role of the academic curriculum, the bill also addresses both alternative education and vocational education. We're going to study some of the alternative education programs because we haven't been very imaginative in the State of Florida in dealing with alternative education. In vocational education, we're giving higher priority, as I pointed out, to job preparatory programs and in particular to ones in high technology occupations and ones in which there are documented, unmet labor market demands. We created regional coordinating councils for each vocational planning region. We've required a majority of the members of that to be business and professional and industrial people, not school people. We've also mandated that those public members will be divided as equally as possible between men and women because one of the major problems in vocational education has been the unwillingness of vocational educators to look at realistic training programs for women in this day and age when most women are working outside their homes.

And while the bill focuses on secondary education, one of the problem areas has been the willingness of the post secondary education institutions—the community colleges, universities—to take less than prepared students. Statewide, nearly forty percent of our community college students are involved in some type of remedial course work. That doesn't speak very well for the high schools of this state, if forty percent of the people who go to community colleges can't take college work. There is also a significant percentage of remediation in the university system, though it is less than the community colleges. At most of the community colleges, seventeen of them, students are getting credit toward graduation and transferrable credit for remedial work. We've abolished that so that whatever work you take in community college that's transferrable has to be at college level. The bill requires the Post Secondary Planning Commission develop a detailed implementation of a plan relating to remediation so that, in effect, the remediation will be out of the post secondary institutions by 1990, which is the date set by the PSPC Commission itself. The bill directs the State Board of Education to adopt a common readiness examination and define a state standard for remediation. Right now, you can go to Tallahassee Community College, take a test, and they tell you, "you have to take this remedial course before you can take our math course." But you could go to Santa Fe and they tell you, "No, you can take college level work." There's no standardization. You can go from one to the other and in one place you would be remedial and in one place you are not. So we want to get some kind of standardization, recognizing that while the student bodies in different places are quite different, we should be operating under a fairly common definition of remediation.

By August of '87, students who want to go into the state university system must have in addition to high school graduation requirements, two years of a foreign language. When they go to community college, and they haven't taken the language requirement, they can take their language requirement within the community college in order to transfer into the state university system. That's something that the Board of Regents is talking about and something we think is exceptionally important in a very, very small world and in a state in which international commerce and international tourism play such an important part in the economy. One quarter of all the foreign tourists who came to the United States last year came to the State of Florida. The tourism business is major, and we need to be able to deal with people and understand people who come from other language backgrounds. And lastly, in this area and in order to improve the academic linkage between the high schools and the colleges, we're requiring the colleges to report the students' progress back to the high schools, so that the high schools can see actually how their students are doing. We can also see whether some high schools are doing a much better job than others and see whether what they are doing can be replicated, or, conversely, if some are doing very badly, why can't we fix that up. Right now, we have no way of knowing because we don't keep records in that kind of a way.

We are all aware that the key to quality education is quality teachers. In this area, the bill does the following. It provides annual scholarships of $4,000 for juniors and seniors who are prospective teachers in academic subjects of critical shortage, such as math, science, industrial arts and foreign languages. And it provides for a student loan forgiveness program, so that if the student works in the public school system for five years, we will forgive their loan. A student who is a subject matter major and who later decides to go into teaching can also participate in the loan forgiveness program. We hope this will encourage more academic majors to go into teaching. The bill also focuses the university Work Study money to give priority to those students who work as lab assistants to high school science teachers. That's another way of exposing some students to the schools and, at the same time, provide some very real assistance to the present high school science teachers. It authorizes business and industry employees to become adjunct teachers in the public schools. It provides for retirees to become adjunct teachers. That's probably the place where our additional math teachers will come from. There are large numbers of retired engineers and military personnel in this state who could very easily qualify to become mathematics teachers and who might very well want to do that for a period or two periods a day. We've authorized a visiting scholars program to bring recent PhD's and people who have done all their work except for their dissertation into the public schools in order to bring the current research to high school faculties. We've authorized the Commissioner of Education to allocate additional funds to high schools that employ Reading Resource Specialists, because when we are talking about raising the level in textbooks, we recognize that a lot of kids in high school have reading problems and that is rarely addressed within a high school curriculum. In order to further the academic credentials of prospective teachers, we're limiting the number of hours that can count toward certification in the colleges of education to fifteen hours per high school teachers and thirty hours per elementary teachers. That will force education students to take more courses in the liberal arts college, the engineering school, or elsewhere in the university to specialize academically in their subject matter. As one teacher representative testified before us, "There is no question that just because you know your subject matter that doesn't mean you can teach it, but it's even more true that if you don't know your subject matter there is no way regardless of what you know about teaching that you are going to be able to teach." We've delayed the sunset of the Teacher Education Centers until October of '84 and authorized Teacher Education Centers to be the contracting agency for the teacher inservice education. We've also provided for intensive summer inservice institutes to get at the problem of teachers who are teaching out-of-field.

We recognized that probably the most important factor in improving schools is to have a good principal, and we've addressed the role of the principal in the following manner. We've directed the Florida Academy of School Leaders to include a component for the principal as an instructional leader, directed the DOE to provide assistance in the selection process, created the Florida Council on Educational Management to develop programs to improve the competence of principals in management, and given them an opportunity in the requirement to study collective bargaining so that we have management people that are as competent as union people in the collective bargaining process.

We've increased the parental and community involvement in the public schools by expanding the scope of the information in the annual school report and increased the discretionary assistance of the school and district advisory committees. And the bill also speaks to the role of the school district and the school boards in a very important way by providing them with the management authority for those items not expressly prohibited by law. They've only up to now had the authority to operate where expressly permitted by law, but this would give them the opportunity to proceed in areas where essentially the law was silent.

We've put all these things together in an attempt to address the concerns of a large number of you who, in turn, have expressed concerns to me and to other members of the committee. We think this bill will really provide a remarkably good opportunity to move this state very far forward in the field of education. I think all of you noted last week that the President's Commission on Excellence in Education essentially made the same recommendations that this committee did. I suspect that they have had a spy at our hearings or something like that. We think that passage of this bill will put Florida very much in the forefront of educational reform in this country—reform that is long overdue.
